

Here Comes the Bride: Yesterday's groom is yesterday's news...

Oh man... check me out. No one in that church is gonna believe I'm really a man...

HERE COMES THE BRIDE

I don't quite look like Kendra either, though, even if this is her wedding gown. Kind of weird that it fits me so well, but whatever. I guess that diet she put me on is paying off. It's pretty ironic... exactly a year ago she was the one standing here: same hotel, same room and everything; same hairstyle, same makeup, same dress, same lingerie for all I know. And now... it's my turn. Of course, she's the one who insisted we have a turnaround wedding, with yours truly as the bride--- and what the wife wants, the wife gets, right? Spineless jellyfish that I am, I went along with it. But I had no idea the beautician Kendra hired could make me look like a real woman, let alone as pretty as I am now, but maybe it's all for the best. I can just relax into the role, pretend I really am Daisy and not have to feel self-conscious about being a dude in a dress. That's probably why she had me listening to all those while-you-sleep CDs. They helped me relax and accept being the girl for awhile. Yep, this is so gonna work.

It'll be strange, going through the whole ceremony as the bride---saying her vows, receiving her ring---and with Kendra done up as the groom. She'll be wearing my tux from last year, of course, but she won't let me see her; not until I get to the altar. Won't be much of a surprise, though; she's bound to end up looking like her identical twin brother. It's too bad Charles won't be there for the wedding; he just got called back to active duty. That'll be the only change in the guest list. I'll miss him. Charlie's a good guy, we get along great.

It's amazing how comfortable I feel. I never cross-dressed before, but it's fun being the gorgeous girl for a change. All of a sudden it doesn't seem so bad, having to spend the next ten days in Aruba pretending to be a woman. Dunno how Kendra managed to get me a passport as Daisy, but... whatever. She'll be using her brother's name, so that's sorted. No idea why it's so incredibly important that I stay in character 24/7 and only use my female name, but hey---if that's what she wants...? I'm not sure what she meant about seeing how it goes for the next few months, but... like... what.
